In his book, "Capital Ideas", Peter Bernstein gave a magisterial account of the academics thinking. But to me his message was clear.

Behavioural investing seek to bridge the gap between psychology and investment. A hugely productive result of their friendship and subsequent collaboration has created a competing vision to the rational model of how people make choices and reach decisions under conditions of uncertainty. If there are ways systematically to beat the markets these days, they probably require men with physics doctorates and massive computer power rather than a smooth Capital Ideas Evolving and the right contact book.
